Side Note: Not sure if this is the same as classical Indian Logic? Bhadarana and Bharata's father, Vasu was blind, and Chacha saw his terrible anguish at losing his son. He went out for a walk one day and met Shankara. "I have a problem, Master," said Chacha. "What is your problem?" asked Shankara. "I have a son who was born blind, so he doesn't see, and his mother is helpless. So she cries, which angers me and makes me furious. Then I am afraid that my anger will lead to my becoming blind. If my son becomes blind, he will also be helpless. So I am afraid that my anger will lead to my becoming blind." Shankara looked closely at him. "I have a solution to this problem, Master. I have two cats that are blind. If I get a third cat, it will take away one of their eyes. When they become blind, I can take them both out, and let them roam around. When they regain their eyesight, they will go out and get milk for me. So, please, have a third cat." Shankara agreed to take on the challenge. Soon, Vasu had a third cat and its name was Gandhari. Shankara and his own cat, Chonchu, were very close. One day, Gandhari had to go out, and Chonchu and Vasu's cat were left alone at home. Shankara's cat, who was very friendly with Chonchu, leapt into Vasu's house and ate the whole lot of food that was there. Vasu cried and ran after his cat, but Shankara had been expecting this and warned him in advance. He had a ladder and climbed on top of the roof. Seeing his cat out of sight, Vasu went up the ladder. But Shankara put down the ladder on top of Vasu and he fell down. Vasu heard a voice and said: "That was my blind son, who was going up to see Chonchu."
