
HACK Chief Architect Libraries is a user library going back to our very first version of any site we started. We have been adding to the library and it has grown some over the years. We hope to make it a resource for as long as you are interested in us and what we are doing. Features will include links to products we believe to be helpful, inspirational ideas, user comments as well as tips, tricks, and methods we have learned over the years we are still actively building.

So, you can do something like this: =IFERROR(B1:B9;"") provided that the values in the range will not exceed the size of the range. If there are just a few values, you could assign them to a range and assign =IFERROR(B1:B9;"") directly. This will give you the output you want. If the exact format of the output changes between versions, then you would need to make sure to translate the cell reference from the old format to the new format. Put this code in a standard module, but replace the cell references with your range. =IFERROR(B1:B9;"") You can read more about IFERROR here: Update You could also use TRANSPOSE to get a range of the values, if you know the number of
