In a telephone interview, Archbishop Ieronymos I took aim at Turkey's intervention in Greece's internal affairs, saying that Ankara's actions could also affect relations with NATO. "As Greeks, we cannot accept being put under the protection of a country which has violated not only the universally accepted rights of the Greek church and all of Greece but also a basic principle of civilization, the protection of minorities," Archbishop Ieronymos said. Archbishop Ieronymos said that the main goal of Turkey's actions was to try to get rid of the Greek Orthodox community in Turkey. "And what is the result of this? That the community is being driven to the edge of extinction. A community that has existed for more than 1500 years, which has its own history and has not been brought in contact with the Turkish culture or Turkish society, is being driven to extinction," he said. "This is something very dangerous," he added. "Such things could have consequences for Greek-Turkish relations with NATO, because these actions go against the protection of minorities and the rights of minority communities to self-governance." According to Archbishop Ieronymos, the Turkish government was trying to destroy the community by "unilateral decisions" and by its insistence on installing "Turkish, Muslim" clerics at the patriarchal monastery of Halki on the island of Halki. The Halki monastery has been the seat of the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople since the 13th century, and is the largest and most important Greek Orthodox monastery in the world 2d92ce491b
