When it comes to working in the public sector, you've got a lot more management overhead. You've got to develop processes that are good processes. You've got to be very aware of employee morale. You can't put out a memo to everybody, "Oh, come to me for help when you're having a problem." You've got to go through a whole series of channels to get the help you need. There's a lot of things you need to be aware of, and I think the public sector is really doing a great job. They're doing a great job. But I do think one of the challenges they have is, especially in smaller cities, small towns, they're facing difficulty attracting the kind of employment and retaining the kind of employees they need. I've been in two different positions with the same organization, working with a small organization where I've been the only employee, and a large organization where I've been the only employee, and I can tell you that it's a totally different experience, and I know that what you just said applies to everybody. When it's a small organization, you're really running the show. And when you're a larger organization, you've got a lot of managers. But I would disagree with your statement about the public sector being good. I think that public sector organizations need to have things like flexible hours, more family friendly environment, stuff like that. You know, if you work in a large organization, you need a lot of flexibility and working around other people's schedules to get things done, because your schedule is being dictated by somebody else's schedule. And I think that's something that public sector people are
